When the grave containing the body of Samuel Emory, the son of Jefferson Davis, was yesterday opened at Oak Hill it was found that the little fellow had been buried in a magnificent San Domingo mahogany casket, on the inside of which was a heavy lead coffin. On the lid being drawn back a skeleton was exposed, though the child died at an age when the bones are not supposed to be solid. A relative of the family was present at the disinterment. The outside or mahogany casket was in a splendid state of preservation, the forty years that have passed since its consignment leaving no effect upon it.

BAD ROADS COMPLAINED OF.

From High street extended there is a complaint coming to town about the condition of the roadway, which increases with every breeze that brings a resident down. All the complainants say that between Holy Rood cemetery and the electric railroad company's power house the narrow space left to the public by the company is at present filled with tracks, ties and other like material, making it almost impossible to pass with a vehicle unless the driver has had experience in western stage driving. Where there are no obstructions in the road there are great ruts, and to escape one danger is to run into another. This condition of things has existed for ten days.

The Canal road is another thoroughfare extensively used by Georgetowners that is just now in a condition bordering on deplorability. From the Aqueduct bridge to the Foxall road there is a continuous string of holes and rocks, and at Green Springs the roadway for a considerable distance has slipped into the canal. The rail that borders the great trough is rendered absolutely useless at this point by the infirmity of the ground surrounding it.
